scrutiny and revision as scholars identify how the written word was used to invent a unified corporate identity here elizabeth freeman examines the classic genre for inventing a past the history chronicle and annal and argues that historical narratives of the english cistercians helped define the characteristics of both the new cistercian monastic order and also the new orders of twelfth and thirteenth century england she shows how aelred of rievaulx's relatio de standardo and genealogia regum anglorum articulated new senses of englishness and demonstrates through attention to library holdings that this focus on national self definition continued throughout the twelfth century the fundacio abbathie de kyrkestall shifts focus to local history and exploits cistercian tropes of land use in order to resolve the communal insecurity that characterised the cistercians in around 1200 the narratione de fundatione fontanis monasterii features another method of reconciling the nostalgic quest for continuity with the intellectual recognition of change it separates historical fact from meaning and imbues events with rich allegorical significance finally ralph of coggeshall's chronicon anglicanum indicates the multiple strategies cistercian historians employed in order to turn the disparate and contradictory events of the past into a comprehensible and meaningful narrative
