The debate over US involvement in World War II was a turning point in the history of both US foreign policy and radio. In this book, the author argues that the debate's historical significance cannot be fully appreciated unless these stories are understood in relation rather than in isolation. All the participants in the great debate took for granted the importance of radio and made it central to their efforts while they generally worked within radio's rules; they also tried to work around or even break those rules, setting the stage for changes that ultimately altered the way media managed American political discourse. This study breaks with traditional accounts that see radio as an industry biased in favor of interventionism. Rather, radio fully aired the opposing positions in the debate; it nonetheless failed to resolve fully their differences despite the initial enthusiasm for radio's educational potential. Participants on both sides came to doubt their conviction that radio could change minds; radio increasingly became a tool to rally existing supporters more than to recruit new ones. Only events ended the debate over US involvement in World War II; the larger question of what role the US should play in world affairs remained.

This paper examines the relationship between women's empowerment and infant and young child feeding practices in central Asia using demographic and health survey data from 1995-2017. We employ a measure of women's empowerment with three distinct dimensions available for a subset of recent surveys as well as a measure of a woman's decision-making power over use of her own income present in all surveys. We identify a positive association between a woman's decision-making power, a measure of her instrumental agency and adherence to World Health Organization recommended feeding practices related to achieving minimum dietary diversity and minimum acceptable diet. We find little significant association between a woman's attitude toward domestic violence or her degree of social independence and adherence to recommended feeding practices. Our results further show that women's decision-making power has the greatest predictive power for adherence to optimal feeding practices among mothers living with a mother-in-law. In contrast, child gender and household poverty do not emerge as important moderators of the relationship between women's empowerment and feeding practices. We thus provide evidence from central Asia, a substantially understudied region, that policies and programs expanding women's decision-making power can improve child nutrition, especially when directed at extended households in which mothers cohabit with in-laws. They suggest that all children would benefit regardless of child gender and availability of complementary household resources.
