this publication provides data and a comprehensive analysis of the literacy of francophones in canada results are based on the international adult literacy survey conducted in 1994 and 1995 in Canada as well as in 20 other countries in 1994 and 1998. This analysis examines the importance of literacy in industrialized countries, describing the issues for francophone communities, reviewing the available data, painting a general picture of francophone literacy in Canada, and discussing literacy in the context of language transfers to English. It also looks at the process of producing literacy and the literacy training of francophones while attempting to sort out the impacts that various social and cultural factors have on literacy.

Inequalities in Literacy Skills Among Youth in Canada and the United States

We use a special Canadian dataset containing both literacy test scores and standard labour market variables to examine the impact of literacy on immigrant earnings. Having a literacy measure allows us to examine issues related to discrimination and the sources of lower returns to foreign-acquired education and experience among immigrants. We find that the native-born literacy distribution, assessed in English or French, dominates that for immigrants. However, immigrants and the native-born appear to obtain the same return to their literacy skills. We argue that this does not support a discrimination explanation for immigrant-native-born earnings differentials. Immigrant shortfalls in literacy can account for about one-half of the earnings gap between university-educated immigrants and similarly educated native-born workers. However, low returns to foreign-acquired experience have a larger impact on the differential, and those low returns are not related to literacy differences. Thus, low literacy among immigrants is an important input to understanding immigrant-native-born earnings differentials, but is not the dominant explanation.
