the important requirements for a gunsmith s workshop are warmth ventilation and light no one can work well if his hands are cold his brain foggy from foul air or his eyes tired from too much or too little light professional gunsmiths take these facts for granted but amateurs usually select the first space available for a shop and then wonder why they continue to turn out poor work the basement is the worst place for a gunsmith it is usually poorly heated in the cold months inadequately ventilated the year round and devoid of natural light dampness causes metal parts to rust the concrete floor is bad for the feet if you must use the basement partition off a section that has a window obtain one of the modern daylight lamps install a blower ventilation system and lay at least a temporary flooring of planks nailed to two by fours the attic can be remodeled to eliminate objectionable features the most serious problem is ventilation but this can be solved by either a blower system or a fan placed in a hole cut into the roof with a cover that drops into place to keep out the rain be sure to strengthen the flooring where you place the bench and any heavy weights if there is no flooring be careful in laying one that you do not break the ceiling plaster of the room below
