statement of purpose explore risk factors across the socioecological framework i.e. individual perpetrator and community levels to identify the most important factors that differentiate elder financial exploitation from other forms of abuse as well as pure from hybrid description of research subjects older adults 65 years and older with a confirmed case of abuse i.e. financial exploitation caregiver neglect physical abuse emotional abuse by texas adult protective services between the years 2009-2014 methods secondary data analysis of a 5 year statewide aggregated cohort of texas adult protective services confirmed cases of abuse between the years 2009 2014 case investigation data such as demographics reported and confirmed abuse types victim and perpetrator mental and physical health substance use social and financial factors along with community level data geographic information systems were analyzed supervised learning which provides a step by step statistical decision making process was used to identify the most reliable interpretive and predictive risk factor models training and test sampling was included for replication purposes results financially based variables are the best predictors of fe versus other forms of abuse but apparent injury appears to be the most important indicator of other forms of abuse even in the presence of fe hybrid fe may be strongly related to poorer outcomes compared to pure fe however the most predictive model found negative effects of others alcohol and substance use by others as well as foreclosure and inadequate medical supplies to be the most important predictors of hybrid fe models that accounted for less linearity between the variables resulted in greater accuracy in group classification indicating the need to account for complex interactions across the socioecological context conclusion different factors across the socioecological context are needed to reliably differentiate between elder fe and other forms of abuse as well as pure versus hybrid fe these factors will also vary depending on the perspective one takes regarding the linearity of the interactions between the different factors the findings provide support for the need to differentiate between types of abuse and subtypes of elder fe and the need for frontline workers and social service agencies and researchers to account for variables across the socioecological context when developing surveillance intervention and prevention programs
