the manufacture of locks and a consideration of the mechanical principles involved in their construction and security have never yet been treated with any degree of fulness in an english work lock making has occupied a large amount of ingenuity and lock patents have been obtained in considerable number though not always we are satisfied with a commensurate return for the expense incurred but lock philosophy if so it may be designated has not been largely attended to and yet it may safely be said that much which is both mechanically and commercially important is comprised in a lock every improvement in the manufacture of iron steel and brass that is in the tool making and machine making processes may be made to reflect its light on the lock manufacture the stamping the casting the planing the slotting the screw cutting the polishing of metals all in proportion as they are improved impart some of their aid to the lock maker then in the finer kinds of locks the works are so delicate as to approach to the nicety of clockwork thereby combining the manipulative skill of a talented artisan with the rougher mechanical work of the smith the principles of mechanical science are also appreciated by many lock makers the lever the inclined plane the eccentric the cam the screw the wheel and pinion the ratchet the spring all are brought to bear on the internal mechanism of locks frequently in many novel combinations
