extraordinary force her dignity her savage hunger her sweetness these poems make me feel as if poems have never before been written louise glück grand tour the debut collection of poetry by elisa gonzalez dramatizes the mind in motion as it grapples with something more than an event she writes of a whole life to transcendent effect by the end we feel we have been witness to a poet remaking herself gonzalez s poetry depicts the fullness of living there are the small moments white wine greening in a glass trumpet blossoms panicking across the garden some poems adopt the oracular quality of a parable but invariably refuse a clear moral the poet moves through elegy romantic and sexual encounters family history and place cyprus puerto rico poland ohio all constellated in a chaos of faraway the collection is held together less by answers than by a persistent question how do you reconcile a hatred for the world s pain with a love for that same world which is indivisible from its worst aspects gonzalez s poems draw us nearer to our own aliveness its fragility and sustaining questions since i do love the world she says she keeps writing inviting us to accompany her as she searches

Possibility of Being: A Selection of Poems review excerpt by connie wanek mnartists.org things you will never see again a collection of poetry by st paul s greg watson is dedicated to the memory of mark allen cole and one cannot help but read the book through the lens of this dedication even the title suggests that the poems are a kind of report to his friend on how the world looks after his death but the work is not uniformly sad by any means nor are the poems confessional or filled with personal detail most of the work is brief and lyrical with attention to sound and the natural image though the setting for most of the poems is urban they are inhabited by sycamores sparrows elms crows fish rivers and lakes and the wind blows through them and they are rain washed watson evokes the natural landscape through lyrical metaphor as in these first lines of the silence of city streets the silence of asphalt like the silence of large water weighted with age and expectation bears the namesake of all our departures occasionally the lines relax into prose the book begins with a prose poem but mostly they are spare watson has enough confidence as a poet to allow a brief but dense thought to stand as a very short poem as in credo presented here in its entirety never turn away from a blessing no matter how severe as suggested by the quotation from the dalai lama which precedes the first poem the theme in these pages is impermanence even a poem like a brief encounter which turns on one of those small miracles of the imagination shares this central notion it s a lovely poem nine lines swift and sure watson has a keen eye and ear in sounds heard during an afternoon storm in september he says the shadows are woolish and the rain sounds like a litter of cats lapping from the same milk bowl many of the poems work the way a zen koan does presenting a paradox or small riddle that must be solved not through rational thought but through acceptance and reconciliation of contradictory truths one feels that the poet too is seeking as he writes and that this process is more the point than any conclusion he may draw too we find the impulse of the buddhist toward humility watson says each time i re write my epitaph it requires fewer and fewer words occasionally a pair of adjectives or an adverb seems unnecessarily decorative as here in monument the thick and stately oak casting small bird like shadows in the feminine overgrown grass part of this is writing style but too many modifiers rather than clarifying can cloud a poem s effect overall though the poems are penetrating and rewarding things you will never see again is watson s third book from march street press in an era when readers patience is often tested by baggy narrative poetry it s refreshing to read poems that move directly toward an essential conclusion modernism is typically associated with novelty and urbanity so what happens when poets identify small communities and local languages with the spirit of transnational modernity are vernacular poetries inherently provincial or implicitly xenophobic how did modernist poets use vernacular language to re imagine the relations between people their languages and the communities in which they live nations of nothing but poetry answers these questions through case studies of british caribbean and american poetries from the 1920s through the 1990s with a combination of fresh insights and attentive close readings matthew hart presents a new theory of a synthetic vernacular writing that explores the aesthetic and ideological tensions within modernism s dual commitments to the local and the global the result is an invigorating contribution to the field of transnational modernist studies chapters focus on a mixture of canonical and non canonical writers combining new literary histories such as the story of how melvin b tolson while a resident of oklahoma was appointed poet laureate of liberia with analyses of poems by gertrude stein w h auden ezra pound and t s eliot more broadly the book reveals how the language of modernist poetry was shaped by the incompletely globalized nature of a world in which the nation state continued to be a primary mediator of cultural and political identity even as its authority was challenged as never before through deft juxtaposition hart develops a new interpretation of modernist poetry in english one that disrupts the critical opposition between nationalism and the transnational paving the way for a political history of modernist cosmopolitanism
